If I were a world leader.....

I have always craved being a leader. From the start of my birth, I loved attention. I would talk, act, play just to be in the spotlight. As I grew older, this desire only deepened. Whether in school, among friends, or within my family, I searched for opportunities to take charge, to inspire, and to imprint an impact. I thrived in group projects, naturally stepping into the role of organizer and motivator. I found joy in speaking up, sharing ideas, and guiding others toward a common goal. Leadership, to me, was never just about authority, it was about influence and power, about making a difference, about bringing people together under a shared and united vision. Even in moments of doubt, when challenges tested my confidence, my passion for leadership never fell. It has shaped my ambitions, my interactions, and my dreams for the future. Then one day, I became the leader of the world.

I immediately fell in love with the position of being in power. Just the thought of helping the world become a better place induced happiness all around in me. But I remembered, "When comes great power, it comes with great responsibility". I knew with just the role in my hands, I could cause change in the whole world. It wasn't just about making decisions; it was about making the right ones, choices that would shape the lives of people and define the future. But the future was in the hands of the citizens who elected me. They are the ones who empower me; without them I would be worthless. As I leader I must act as a role model. But even the smallest misstep can create the biggest blunders.

On the first year of my rule, I would want all my fellow countries to shake hands with each other. No human must strip the life and dignity of another. Hatred shall be extinct and never to be found in mankind. Unity must be within every one of us, despite our race, ethnicity, gender, size, age, etc. When one man falls, others should stand up. Wars and conflicts should become artifacts of the past, simple echoes just to remind us of what not to be. No nation should spill blood over power, greed, or misunderstandings. Borders that separated us should be represented as walls but rather bridges to each other. Every citizen, regardless of where they are from, should be able to spread their voice and have their rights protected. With this, I end my first year of my rule.

On the second year of my rule, I will decree that education and health is free. I vision the day where the poor get to study with the rich, equally with no discrimination. The knowledge from books will be spread by people regardless of their wealth. No child or adult should be denied their right to learn, and their families shouldn't decide between survival and school. Hospitals will open their doors to all, with no price-tags that kill people. Everyone is entitled to education as it is not a privilege but rather a right. The walls of inequality will fall, allowing people to work together in a society where wealth doesn't separate us.

On my last and final year, I would protect and nurture our mother Earth. We have taken her organs and now we are threatening her life. But now it is time to heal the wounds that we have inflicted upon her. We no longer shall strip her forest bare, poison her waters, and suffocate her sky with smoke. I will lead a movement to restore what has been lost, planting life where once it was lost, cleansing the once tainted rivers, and ensuring that what we inhale won't be our last. Our economy should thrive but not in the life of our Mother. Innovation will pave a path to a healthier and sustainable future. Future generations should be seen as lush greenery, vibrant wildlife, and beautiful oceans rather than destructive buildings. Our Mother Earth has provided us with a lot of vitals, but now it is our turn to give back in actions.

By the end of my long rule, I would have shaped the world to become a better place. My dream will become reality. I will become an historical artifact that no one will forget. The artifact will inspire and create people who will follow the path that I carved. I managed to bring back that once was lost. Our world has multiple flaws, but if we humans stand together, we can accomplish anything. Discrimination has become part of our day-to-day life. No one pays heed to the needy but instead looks up to the wealthy. Our social status is what is ripping us apart, but what instead we should be looking at is our intelligence and humanity. If we just focus our attention on other people too rather than just on your phones or yourself, maybe you can help accomplish a greater goal that can help prolong a long and healthy life for all.
