

I woke up and went outside my house and stepped over a little brick wall to the shops. I went into a shop and bought some oxygen potions because there were no trees and I wanted to fix that. I took every bottle of oxygen potion I could find and there were a lot because other people didn't care about the trees anymore. I took them outside the store and back home. I planted them in the ground with their lids on so the potion wouldn't spill out.

Once underground, the potion bottle cracked open like a seed through the cracked the glass a the stems and roots began to grow as an oxygen potion tree grew. After I got the glass and caps and the hard shell of the seeds out and put them in the trash because they didn't need them anymore.

The potion trees grew more bottles of oxygen potion and anything anything that contained oxygen.

People don't need air in their houses and thought oxygen was bad so they had stopped caring about the trees. They all stayed in their houses which now had too much carbon dioxide so people were dying. The houses had no roofs and instead it had a rainproof force field that only oxygen could get through. The oxygen potion trees started growing and the oxygen got through the force field roofs, into the houses to help people exist. So the world was saved.

Written by Tate Alexander Griffin

Typed up by Kristina Griffin (mom)