

Lolly and Pop

Once upon a time, there were two girls - Lolly and Pop. They were best friends, but they fought a lot. One day during recess, I found Pop sitting on a bench, looking sad. I asked her what the matter was. Pop said, "Lolly is excluding me. She won't let me join in the group." Pop didn't want to talk to Lolly, but I convinced her to speak up for herself. Then we decided to go talk to Lolly, but Lolly ran away. We ran after her but at last, we got tired and stopped. Just then I remembered that at the beginning of the year, our teacher said that if a person is doing something to you that you don't like, you can say stop. If the person doesn't stop, you can report them to a teacher. So, Pop told our teacher what Lolly had done.

I played with Pop (because Pop usually played with Lolly). Pop didn't look so sad anymore, and we were having fun. We saw our teacher talking to Lolly and noticed that Lolly was crying. I wished I could comfort her. Finally, it was time to go inside. While we were putting our things away, Lolly told me that she'd never trust me again. But I didn't mind because I knew she would trust me again someday. She did end up trusting me again the next day and told me so (It's hard to not trust me). That recess, Lolly, Pop and I all played together. I was a little surprised that Lolly wasn't angry with us. I also felt good that Lolly wasn't excluding Pop anymore, and my little act of kindness had helped Pop feel happy again. We all lived happily ever after!
